DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER

R3200 BR 4-6-2 A4 CLASS 'DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER' 60008

Britain in the 1930's was a place in which luxury, glamour and boundary pushing were all revered and admired. The railway companies of the time, particularly the LNER and the LMS, were equally keen to embrace these aims, and competition between them was intense as they vied for the lucrative London to Scotland traffic. Chief Mechanical Engineer of the LNER, Nigel Gresley, adapted the A3 design to create a locomotive capable of pulling eight or nine carriages at high speed. The resulting A4 Class Express Pacific locomotive with streamlined, aerodynamic casing was designed to optimise power and speed and epitomised the ethos of the time.

During this decade the world speed record for steam locomotion was being continually broken and in June 1937 the British record was held by the LMS at 114mph. Determined to regain its earlier record, the LNER, pulled together a crew with a reputation for running trains hard but the record attempt was not mentioned until they were onboard. On the 3rd July 1938 an LNER A4 Class locomotive, 'Mallard' reached speeds of 126mph, breaking not only the British record but also the world record. The record remains unbroken to this day.

'Golden Shuttle' No.4496 entered traffic in September 1937 in Garter Blue livery and after some years in wartime black, was re-liveried in Garter Blue but re-named 'Dwight D Eisenhower'. In 1948 British Railways re-numbered the locomotive as No.60008 and in November 1951 the livery was changed to BR Brunswick Green. Withdrawn in July 1963 the locomotive was cosmetically restored and shipped to the USA as a permanent exhibition. In October 2012 locomotive 'Dwight D Eisenhower' travelled back to the UK to take part in 'The Great Gathering' at the NRM, York in 2013.
