Colour Temperature

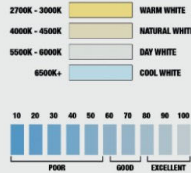

The colour temperature refers to the kind of light produced, typically compared to the equivalent level of daylight. The temperature is measured in Kelvins and ranges from soft warm light, like early morning sun, through to the cool bright daylight of a clear afternoon. When choosing a lamp consider the application and choose a colour temperature to suit, a warm light can be used to create a relaxed atmosphere, while cool light is brighter and crisper, ideal for precision work.

CRI (Colour Render Index)

CRI measures a light source's ability to reproduce colour realistically & naturally in comparison to sunlight. Good quality light is made up of a whole spectrum of colours. CRI testing measures how well the lamp renders each of these - the more fully that all colours of the spectrum are present in white light, the more fully and accurately you'll see colours under it. The Colour Render Index is shown as a scale from 0 -100 with natural sunlight being 100. The higher the number the more accurately the colours are reproduced.

Lumens

Lumens indicate the true brightness of a bulb regardless of the power required to light the bulb in Watts. The higher the lumen rating, the brighter the lamp will appear.
